WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

The region will be in between a high pressure ridge to the east and a broad low pressure trough off shore for the next few days. This will keep our weather quite seasonable with a mix of sun and high cloudiness. Some areas will have somewhat gusty winds at times as well. The warmest inland areas will reach into the low 70s. Freezing overnight lows in the mountain valleys in particular will continue especially when skies are mostly clear. Areas of overnight and morning valley fog are also possible ('tis the season). Saturday afternoon a weather system will be moving ashore and spread at least light precipitation to much of region through Sunday, except areas east of the Cascade/Sierra crest are not likely to see much if any. Lingered clouds and a few light showers may continue into early Monday, followed by a short break before another system moves ashore Tuesday with a bit more light precipitation, mainly for the northern areas. Following another short break between systems Wednesday, a more widespread, sustained period of light precipitation appears to be possible the end of next week. Snow levels will be up and down with each weather system, and the lowest levels should be mostly around 6000-7000 feet through next week.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Minimum relative humidity (RH) will drop into the 8-12% range in the lower foothills and urban interface areas from Point Conception southward, but stable conditions and light winds aloft will continue to allow for morning fog in the San Joaquin Valley today. Today, low level flow will transition from offshore to onshore which should begin to cool temperatures back to near normal readings over the weekend. Some mid and high clouds may reach the desert and San Bernardino and Cleveland National Forest today, but any associated precipitation should remain over Arizona and northern Mexico. A trough will bring another round of rain to the northern part of the state this weekend and a few showers may occur over Monterey County and the Sierras north of Yosemite National Park tomorrow night and Sunday. Elsewhere, expect mostly sunny skies, light winds and near normal temperatures over the weekend. Marine layer stratus should make a return to inland valleys by Sunday. Warmer weather is expected to return next Monday and Tuesday.
